8. Programme Aims:

The Film and Television Studies programme provides advanced study of histories, theories and critical approaches pertinent to the study of film and television, covering a wide range of cultural practice around and within both mediums from their origins to the present day. That film and television are taught side-by-side is a distinctive feature of the programme and stress is placed on the diversity of production and experience of both mediums and their ever-changing forms, in response to a similarly diverse network of influences and ambitions.

¹ This specification provides a concise summary of the main features of the programme and the learning outcomes that a typical student might reasonably be expected to achieve and demonstrate if full advantage is taken of the learning opportunities that are provided. More detailed information on the learning outcomes, content and teaching, learning and assessment methods of each course can be found in course handbooks and other programme documentation and online at www.gla.ac.uk

The accuracy of the information in this document is reviewed periodically by the University and may be checked by the Quality Assurance Agency for Higher Education.

The programme aims to:

- provide a range of topics, approaches and methodologies which will enable students to construct a learning programme which explores key areas in film and television studies and reflects their own interests in the discipline;
- provide a context for the advanced critical understanding of selected aesthetic, cultural and historical debates in film and television studies
- provide a context for the understanding of the cultural background and industrial practices within which cinema and television are produced and consumed
- provide a context for the confident and critical application of theoretical approaches and methods to specialised areas of cinema and television;
- foster and refine skills in independent and group research and encourage advanced levels of scholarship in response to current academic research in selected fields of study;
- consolidate effective presentational skills appropriate for the activities being undertaken and the context in which they are presented.

9. Intended Learning Outcomes of Programme:

The programme provides opportunities for students to develop and demonstrate knowledge and understanding, skills, qualities and other attributes in the following areas.

Knowledge and Understanding

By the end of this programme, students will be able to:

- evaluate and analyse films and television programmes using various methods of analysis within specific cultural and historical contexts.
- understand and contextualise critical texts in relation both to the methods employed and the broader context in which critical debate has developed in the field of film and television studies.

Skills and Other Attributes

By the end of this programme, students will be able to:

- make detailed textual analysis of film and television material and apply such skills in independent work.
- recognise research approaches, themes and methods across a variety of topics which will include mainstream and non-mainstream cinema and video material.
- understand the way in which particular instances of film and television are positioned in, arise out of, and are regulated by institutions, policies and other frameworks.

Intellectual Skills

By the end of this programme, students will be able to:

- develop ideas independently and apply them in different contexts.
- identify the relationship between different intellectual approaches and choose those appropriate to a particular instance

Transferable/key skills

By the end of this programme, students will be able to:

- select and manage a learning programme within specific frameworks, incorporating independent and team or group work;

- identify, construct and execute individual research projects, based upon broad knowledge of subject specific areas and drawing on appropriate resources.
- deliver critical, coherent and (where appropriate) imaginative presentations of ideas in a range of formats, using appropriate conventions of acknowledgement and referencing.

10. Typical Learning and Teaching Approaches:

Learning and teaching takes place through a number of modes: Screenings are integrated into the courses and teaching involves a mix of lectures, seminars, group work, student presentations, and individual tutorials. Dissertation work is supported with specialist input by staff from the library and the effective learning service. Presentations to peer-group and academic staff take place at several points during the course; throughout emphasis is placed on student discussion and interaction.

11. Typical Assessment Methods:

Students' knowledge, understanding and skills will be assessed in the various types of assignment set within the mandatory and optional courses in FTV. Assessments, which vary across courses as appropriate to the subject matter and disciplinary methods, include: examinations, coursework essays, portfolios, reports, video/digital film work, learning logs, oral presentations and the research dissertation. Some of these assessments are undertaken on a group as well as individual basis.

12. Programme Structure and Features:
