9 September 23rd Sunday in Ordinary Time
Getting out of bed in the morning is a risky business. I mean, there is just no telling what will happen. It is probably why many people postpone it for as long as possible! In today’s Gospel passage, Jesus is faced with a risk. It is the risk that when He heals the deaf and dumb man, people will tell of His miracle cure and this will play into the hands of His enemies. That is why He acts in private out of public view and charges the disciples to tell no-one.

It is not just the mere act of curing the man like some wandering witch doctor, but what it signified. The clue to the significance of what He performed lies in the first reading from the prophet, Isaiah. He foretells of a coming Messiah who will make the deaf hear, the blind see, the silent given voice and the lame leap like a deer. All of this, His Galilean onlookers would have known well. Thus Jesus’ mighty deeds fulfill what was promised in a way that cannot be contained. Therefore, He ushers in the Kingdom of God and reveals His true identity. Why does Jesus apparently put caution to the wind and continue to heal the deaf and dumb man? Out of compassion, out of love. Charity comes before His own interests. He knows the risks of playing in to the hands of His enemies and does it anyway! We too should look to act out of compassion and not worry too much about the consequences.

There is another subtle risk in the Gospel: touch. St. Mark retells the physicality of how the miracle is performed: a certain tactile quality emerges. Even if using spittle on another and putting fingers in the ears of another might strike us as irksome today, we must read what is going on in these gestures. Compassion is felt, not spoken. But it carries a risk of rebuke, dismissal perhaps. Touch is important for those who are poor according to the world about whom we heard in the Second Reading. It might be the holding of a hand, an embrace, or just a reassuring pat. These actions help to convey that which words only signal; our compassion, our love. These physical gestures are certainly risky - they might be misunderstood and might make us feel uncomfortable but, in the appropriate context, we do it anyway. Compassion and human contact make us God’s instruments, if we act in His service. However, that requires something beforehand, the biggest risk of all: discipleship.
To encounter Jesus is to be transformed. This transformation can be in the form of an exterior miracle, as in today's Gospel, or much more commonly a change of heart, a conversion. This is not a one-off event but a constant process of sanctification. Ephphatha - be opened. Jesus opens the ears of the deaf, the mouths of the dumb. Moreover, He opens the hearts of the wick-ed. Open wide the doors to Christ! In what respects are we too deaf to hear the Word of the Lord, too tongue tied to tell the Good News? When was the last time our hearts of stone were prised open by an encounter with Jesus in His Word, through His Sacra-ments, in His Spirit? How do we react to such an encounter? As with the disciples, we respond with unbounded admiration: thanksgiving and worship. This is what we do at Mass, and that is certainly worth getting out of bed for! When we feel like lying in, when we are uncertain about what to do, when we feel distant from God, don't let that put you off from loving Jesus and neighbour. Each day let us pick up our cross and follow His path of love. This is the human experience, life's adventure, and one that by His grace will take us to heaven.

CATECHIST’S CORNER
What did you go into the desert to see? Our Lord asked the people. He might ask us the same question about going to Mass. What do we come to see or hear? Is it the latest fashions or a musical performance? If it were, we would make sure that we were there early to get the best seats. However, this is not why we come to Mass. We come to honour Jesus who is present on the altar, body, blood, soul and divinity, under the appearance of bread and wine. This Jesus, who is also God, is waiting to greet us and come to us in Holy Communion. To receive Jesus in Holy Communion it is surely worth a little effort to make sure that we arrive in time for the beginning of Mass.
