Bad news travels fast. The tower at Siloam in Jerusalem fell killing people. Shoddy building work? Perhaps? Some disturbance in the temple? Pilate’s solution as colonial ruler was to kill a few people – keep the locals in order by fear. Disasters happen and people, good and bad alike, get killed.

In today’s gospel people arrive breathless with the latest bad news – they are specific incidents, not generalities. Did these Galileans deserve to die? Was their worship in the temple faulty? Were the Jerusalemites killed by the collapsed tower especially notorious sinners? Did these particular individuals rather than other individuals deserve to die – that seems to be the presumption. It is a frequently asked kind of question, why do bad things happen to good people?

We can sometimes – slightly guiltily - take pleasure when bad things happen to bad people, whether fleeing thugs getting killed in a one-car crash, or when the police shoot someone who has kidnapped a child. Bad things happening to bad people seems OK – we can cope with it. Bad things happening to good people however, seems unjust, sometimes very unjust. Jesus’ immediate reply to the avid news-mongers is not to give a simple explanation. Instead He calls us all to repentance. We are not to gloat over disasters happening to others, thinking ourselves exempt from the possibility of facing imminent judgement. No, we are to repent, to orientate our lives towards God and live out His mercy. That is why we read this gospel passage during Lent.

Jesus supplements this call to repentance by telling a parable about a fig tree. Fig trees do not bear fruit apparently until they are two or more, usually three, years old – as everyone knew in those days. At three years old the fig tree should be bearing fruit and so deserving its place in the vineyard. If it isn’t bearing fruit, cut it down, and plant something that will fruit, a tree that will enhance the beauty of the vineyard. Here we remember that in the Old Testament the vineyard represents God’s people, so this barren fig tree symbolises an unfruitful member of God’s people. However, the gardener intercedes: he offers to manure it, tend it gently, and perhaps it will fruit next year; this tree is just slow to mature. The gardener’s intercession is granted, the tree lives another year after the threatened disaster in the hope that it will bear fruit. So for us, we are to be FRUITFUL IN GOOD WORKS. Whatever disaster we encounter, whether in our personal lives or in the public life of our country/world we are urged to bear fruit. In our first reading God reveals to Moses His sacred name, a name so holy that by Jesus’ time only the high priest pronounced it and even then, only once a year. The etymologists tell us that the sacred name probably best rendered something like “I am who I am” is clearly formed from the Hebrew verb “to be”. God is. If we try to imagine God, we are likely to imagine God in our own image, a God who saves the just – like us - and punishes the wicked with hell – and most especially the sinners we particularly hate, terrorists, or paedophiles, or that bloke over there. We can quote plenty of Old Testament texts to that effect. Jesus, the Son of God is heading to Jerusalem, the site of the disasters talked about, to reveal God’s love, that God is Jesus crucified for us and all creation, to tend His vineyard with us to be fruitful fig trees or vines. We are not only a fruitful vineyard, the people of God, but also children of God, made perfect through suffering like the Son of God, and in fruitfulness united to God.

CATECHIST’S CORNER

Many equate greed with gluttony. However, they are two distinct sins. While gluttony is an obsession with food, greed, traditionally known as avarice, is the excessive love of possessing material things. We recognise greed easily in others, but not in ourselves. The media report the extravagant lifestyles of the super-rich and the huge bonuses of bankers and, like the pharisee in the Gospels, we thank God that we are not like them. However, when we see advertisements for the latest spring fashions or a new fragrance it is very easy to decide that we must have them whether we need them or not. Greed is insidious and, in this instance, is playing on our desire to be in the forefront of fashion. If we want to avoid greed, we do not need to start feeling guilty about our possessions, but we do need to learn generosity. Generosity is the best antidote to greed there is and Lent is the ideal time to start practising it.
